Taniesha Anderson, 19, really can use a vehicle to continue developing her independent living skills as she enters adulthood. The “ride” she seeks is unlike those sought by most others her age — for very good reason.

The Minot native and resident was born with caudal regression syndrome, a developmental disorder that impairs her spinal cord, lower back, limbs and more. She’s weathered six surgeries and many therapies during her life, and she uses a wheelchair.

Taniesha was about to take her road test for her driver’s test when her mom’s vehicle, which had adaptive equipment, including hand controls, was hit from behind and totaled. That’s brought this online college criminal justice student and part-time retail employee’s pursuit to a screeching halt.

Please help her get back on the road to greater mobility and independence again.
